It's like my lack of knowledge and know how and fear of failure, not to mention not having the money to just throw at something has kept me at bay of pursuing anything at all other than necessary jobs to keep food on the table. Excellent book for a woman of my stage moving from one part of my life into the second stage. I appreciated all the inspiring tales about other women who lived out the second half of their lives quite differently than the first half.

Myquestionis:woulditreallymatter? The autonomy we create and the mastery we pursue must also connect to something bigger than ourselves to be truly satisfying. Interesting article. When a trial policy was put in place that allowed doctors to spend one day each workweek doing the work that had the most purpose to them, such as patient care, research or community service, they suffered half the burnout rate of other doctors who did not get to engage in those activities.

Bourke's vulnerability and story-driven approach offers essential principles.
