The Eighth Amendment was added into the constitution, in a part of the Bill of Rights. New York did indeed ratify the Constitution on July 26, the lack of public support for pro-Constitution Federalists has led historian John Kaminski to suggest that the impact of The Federalist on New York citizens was "negligible". As a result of this, this left a weak and ineffective central government that lacked powers that are crucial to the governance of a nation such as the ability to tax to generate revenue, establish a national court system, and have a national currency.
